Summary

Over the course of four years, Ross Cline (柯受恩) endured a systematic series of judicial abuses culminating in forced exile from Taiwan despite having committed no criminal act. The Taiwan judicial authorities denied him access to basic legal protections, ignored key defense evidence, imposed arbitrary punishments, and forced him into a legal nightmare that destroyed his business, reputation, and emotional well-being. Even after fleeing to Canada, bureaucratic harassment persisted until international exposure efforts finally forced Taiwan's prosecutors to abruptly "close" the case without apology or redress. The trauma and damages inflicted over these years are severe, ongoing, and demand urgent corrective action, acknowledgment, and fair compensation.
